As a parent navigating the court-ordered community service process, the logistical strain on our family was significant. I had to repeatedly disrupt my workday to drive my 15-year-old to and from physical service sessions at a co-working space. I desperately wished a parent-supervised, home-based option existed.

Little Ray Children's Books Inc's proposed literacy-to-advocacy program is exactly what St. Johns County families need. By allowing parents to supervise reading during library hours and monitor the reporting assignments directly from home, the court can ensure high-quality behavioral rehabilitation without forcing working parents to sacrifice their livelihoods. It turns a logistical nightmare into a meaningful, home-supervised educational opportunity.

Thank you.
